- (19) “There is no organic social relation among its individual personalities. They are each independent entities. Ezekiel carried this principle still further by separating the moral life of the individual into single separate acts. Life was to him not an organic whole, but composed of countless single acts. Character was not taken into account. This has been called the atomism of the moral life, for life is divided into atoms in this theory. If a righteous man sins, his whole life of righteousness is not counted. If a wicked man repents and does justly, his whole life of wickedness is not counted.” Julius A.
